1.0			Support Coordinator	Governing body

A support coordinator and a specialist support coordinator sound similar. They work in a similar way. But they look after different NDIS categories of support.

Support coordination helps you plan and start your supports and programs that the NDIS pays for.

Your support coordinator helps you choose providers and connect with services.

Specialist support coordination helps if you have extra or more complex needs.

These needs can be paid for by the NDIS and by other community services.

Some of these needs could be:

- psychological and mental health support
- ongoing support from a social worker
- help when things are at a crisis point
- help with housing, health or the justice system

A specialist support coordinator usually has more training, like a social worker, occupational therapist or psychologist.

4. Your other supports

Your other supports are usually given by support workers, allied health practitioners and others who help you day to day.

This could be home support — for example, getting ready, going out in the community, or therapy supports.

We talk about the people who give you these other supports during our support coordination meetings.

5. Ask us

If you are not sure which one you have, or which one is right for you, ask us. We can also organise an interpreter or an advocate to help.
